Policing Data:
What is it, what can we do with it, and why is it so hard to get?

Monday, November 15th
2-3 PM (EST)

The key to unlocking answers for some of policing’s most pressing questions lies in data held by police departments themselves. However, very little of this data is made public. This event in the Justice Collaboratory’s Fall 2021 Policing Conversations Series will identify what policing data is, what kinds of insights can be yielded from it, and how public access to it can be improved.

PARTICIPANTS

Anna Harvey
President - Social Science Research Council and Professor of Politics - New York University

Jonathan Mummolo
Assistant Professor of Politics and Public Affairs - Princeton University

FALL 2021 Policing Conversation Series

This series will examine some of the most significant structural barriers to policing reform, including limitations on local control, lack of transparency, and gaps in civilian oversight. Through discussions with leading experts and practitioners, this three-part series will identify policy-based solutions for overcoming these barriers. All three of these events will be hosted on Zoom.