In the midst of a summer of protests and calls for change, the Justice Collaboratory (JC) hosted an event to bring together experts, advocates, and academics from across the country to discuss the meaning of “Community Vitality” and its implications for police reform.

The JC is excited to announce the launch of the Community Vitality Survey. The survey aims to better understand the preferences of police officers and residents regarding the safety, wellness, and vitality of local communities. This project will identify areas of overlap between the interests of police officers and residents, and help to inform the development of more pro-social strategies.

To that end, the JC hosted an event with experts, advocates, and academics from across the country to discuss the meaning of “Community Vitality” and its implications for police reform. The event was held on October 26, 2020, and was moderated by Professor Tracey Meares, a leading expert in the field of criminal justice.

The event featured a panel of experts, including Dwayne Betts, a criminal justice scholar and advocate, and Jorge Camacho, a lawyer and policy expert. The panelists discussed the role of criminal justice in shaping communities and the importance of pro-social strategies in reducing police brutality.

The JC is also launching a new research study looking into the idea of “Community Vitality.” The study will focus on understanding the preferences of police officers and residents regarding the safety, wellness, and vitality of local communities. The study will use data to track the project’s impact and will be published on our Collab in Action blog.

In addition, the JC is launching a new website that will feature a more intuitive user interface and a range of new features. The website will be launched later this year.

This month, the JC hosted an event with experts, advocates, and academics from across the country to discuss the meaning of “Community Vitality” and its implications for police reform. The event was held on October 26, 2020, and was moderated by Professor Tracey Meares, a leading expert in the field of criminal justice.

The event featured a panel of experts, including Dwayne Betts, a criminal justice scholar and advocate, and Jorge Camacho, a lawyer and policy expert. The panelists discussed the role of criminal justice in shaping communities and the importance of pro-social strategies in reducing police brutality.

The JC is also launching a new research study looking into the idea of “Community Vitality.” The study will focus on understanding the preferences of police officers and residents regarding the safety, wellness, and vitality of local communities. The study will use data to track the project’s impact and will be published on our Collab in Action blog.

In addition, the JC is launching a new website that will feature a more intuitive user interface and a range of new features. The website will be launched later this year.