

Noureddine Amara holds a Ph.D. in History from the Sorbonne in Paris. His dissertation was on “The Making of France in Algeria: Algerian Emigration, Misusage of the Name and Nationality Conflicts in the World (1830-to the 1930s).” Before his doctoral studies, he taught high school in France and Algeria. Noureddine plans to rewrite his dissertation for publication as a monograph and begin a second project examining documents in French consular archives from Moroccans, Tunisians and other Ottoman subjects who sought French protection by producing proof of Algerian origins. He has also embarked on a new collaborative project on postcolonial legacies in Europe, Africa, and the Americas with Professor of Anthropology M. Amah Edoh from M.I.T. and Liliane Umbyeyi.
