

Sohaib Khan is a scholar of comparative Islamic studies with an interest in law and economic life in Muslim societies. His research, teaching, and public scholarship lie at the intersection of religious studies, anthropology, economic history, and comparative studies of South Asia and the Middle East. Sohaib's work integrates textual and ethnographic methods in understanding Islamic encounters with capitalist modernity. Specifically, he investigates hitherto marginalized histories of Indo-Muslim receptions of capitalism through the lens of local Muslim jurists and their indigenous knowledge traditions. Funded by the Wenner-Gren Foundation, the Andrew Mellon Foundation, and the US Department of Education, Sohaib's research articulates trajectories of Islamic law from its doctrinal content to its material circulations in avowedly secular financial contests. Sohaib received his Ph.D. (2020) from Columbia University. Prior to joining Yale, he taught as a Mellon Postdoctoral Fellow at Williams College.
