Overview
In an effort to unite legal scholarship and legal practice, and to advance the public interest, in 2017 the Yale Law Journal partnered with the Yale Law School to provide three one-year public interest fellowships annually. The Fellows, after completing their year of public service, will publish reflections on their experience in the Journal’s online component, the Forum. In addition, the Journal will host a yearly gathering where incoming Fellows are welcomed and outgoing fellows are honored for their work. By sponsoring these Fellows, and by incorporating their legal insights into the YLJ’s scholarship, the Journal seeks to foster a closer relationship between legal scholarship and practice.

Named Fellowships
The three YLJ Public Interest Fellowships are named after three graduates of the Yale Law School: Justine Wise Polier, Jane Matilda Bolin, and Shirley Adelson Siegel.

- Justine Wise Polier was an editor of Volume 37 of the Yale Law Journal and graduated from Yale Law School in 1928. Prior to law school, she advocated for labor rights at a woolen mill in Passaic, New Jersey. After graduating, she became the first woman to hold a judicial office above magistrate in New York. She served for thirty-eight years as a New York State Family Court judge. Throughout her career, Polier was seen as a brilliant judge and activist who championed the rights of children and the civil rights of African Americans. After retiring from the bench, she served as director of the Juvenile Justice Division of the Children’s Defense Fund.

- In 1931, Jane Matilda Bolin was the first African-American woman to graduate from Yale Law School. She went on to become the first African-American woman to join the New York City Bar Association, the first to join the New York City Law Department, and the first to serve as a judge in the United States. Her judgeship began in 1939 when she was sworn into the bench of the New York City Domestic Relations Court, and she served in this capacity until she retired at the age of seventy. Throughout her career, Ms. Bolin remained committed to civil service, and worked closely with the NAACP, serving on its executive committee.

- Shirley Adelson was an editor of Volume 49 of the Yale Law Journal and graduated from Yale Law School in 1941. She was the only woman in her law school class and went on to work in public housing and civil rights, ultimately becoming the head of the civil-rights bureau of the New York City Law Department in 1959. There she worked to break up discriminatory apprenticeship requirements in the building trades. She also served as general counsel of the Housing and Development Administration and as New York State’s solicitor general. After taking a few decades off from practicing law in order to teach, she returned to foreclosure prevention work in 2008.

Application and Selection
The application and the February 1, 2018 application deadline for the YLJ Fellowship tract the YPIF Fellowship exactly and students should review the information for the YPIF Fellowship, including the list of materials required for submission. The YPIF application information is available here. Selections are made in a two-step process. First, the faculty committee selects a group of nine fellows. Then, a committee comprised of the current Editor-in-Chief and two current YLJ editors chosen by the YLJ Officer Board will designate the three YLJ Fellows from among the Fellows chosen by the faculty selection committee.

Students interested in applying for a YLJ fellowship must meet with Norma D’Apolito, Director of Public Interest, to discuss the scope and details of their fellowship proposals prior to applying. Questions about the fellowship and the application process can be directed to her at norma.dapolito@yale.edu or (203)436-2580.

Terms of the Fellowship

Generally, fellowships are funded for one year, and in very limited circumstances, such as when matching funds are available from other sources, some extensions may be available. The fellowship begins in late summer or fall 2018 through summer 2019.

Each YLJ fellowship provides a one-year stipend of $47,500 and a health-care contribution of up to $5,000 in cases where health care benefits are not provided by the host organization. In recognition of the additional writing component, YLJ fellows will receive an additional $5,000 payment at the end of their fellowship term.
